THE DEATH OF ROMMEL

Keitel testifies that General Burgdorf was the successor of General Schmundt. Burgdorf was chief of the Army Personnel Office since August 1944, and also was chief adjutant to the Fuehrer. Keitel met him almost every day at headquarters, and saw him last in April 1945 in the Reichs Chancellory in Berlin, but does not know what has happened to him (p.1-3). Keitel knew General Meisel, who was deputy to Burgdorf since August 1944, but saw him rarely at headquarters. He saw Meisel last in September 1944. (p.2-3)

Keitel stated that he sent Burgdorf with a note to Marshal Rommel to inform him that he would have a trial for treason. He sent also a written testimony of Lt. Col. von Hofacker who was on the staff of General von Stuelpnagel in Paris and who was liaison man between Stuelpnagel in Paris and the Putsch Committee in Berlin. The testimony showed that Hofacker had contacted Rommel to interest him in the planned Putsch against Hitler and his government (20. July 1944) and that Rommel responded with the words: "they could count on him." Keitel told Rommel in his note to take consequences if this testimony was true.

The Fuehrer had ordered Keitel to inform Rommel about the mentioned testimony. Keitel directed Burgdorf to take poison and a pistol along with him and put them at Rommel's disposal.
