THROUGH WITH GERMANY, START ON BERLIN.

From late 1937, Belgium was declared a "neutral" country. Although Belgium had "neutrality," it was more like a "neutral" country than a true neutral state. The country was unable to maintain its independence from emerging powers, especially Nazi Germany.

France was the main power in Europe. With the defeat of Belgium in 1939, it was clear that the UK could not intervene in the conflict. The UK decided to evacuate its forces to France.

In the early hours of 30 April, 1940, the German army launched an offensive against France. The French forces were defeated quickly, and the country fell under German control.

On 25 June, 1940, Germany declared war on Britain. The British forces were defeated quickly, and the country fell under German troops soon afterward.
